EXTRACT from a letter of John C. Calhoun (son of the Calhoun), Chairman of the Florida Committee that addressed Kossuth, to the New York Herald:

His hasty and brief reply to that address, upon hearing it read, amidst the confusion of an "amalgamated crowd of whites, and mulattoes, and blacks, and Indians," under circumstances, he regarded by should not, under the circumstances, be regarded by any liberal Southerner as exceptionable. The reason why the first negro deputation was at first deemed offensive, not only by myself, but by other citizens of the Southern States, of which Gov. Kossuth was informed. His verbal exposition of his course and of his feelings, and the "card" addressed by him to the people of the United States," in the Herald of the next day, was deemed satisfactory as respected him. By most of the citizens of Southern States here, who were not fully satisfied, penned a letter to be delivered to him and to be published; but after some consultation and reflection, it was concluded it would be unjust to do this, and, moreover, as I conceived, unnecessary, other persons than Gov. Kossuth, entertained very different opinions and feelings, and yet my opinions and feelings in this regard, were not influenced by my course, not necessary to be here referred to. I, for one, do not regard the "sympathy" with our institutions, which, I have been told, has been placed by others on the "same platform of our being objectionable." Nor do I regard the "sympathy" with the European revolutionary spirit of equalization, or the less worthy one of the incendiaries, that addressed him at Washington, I consider the figure of speech used by you as rather fanciful and much too strong under the circumstances. I, for one, should not have had a feeling of uneasiness, if he had allowed himself to be placed on the same platform of equality. Doing an act appropriate and right in itself for me to do, does not necessarily lead to the right in itself for me to do, and the political, of these of my own political, and political, of these of my own political, and political, of these of my own political, and that it should be disposed to repeal them. They carry with them so many elements of discord with our sister States, and foreign nations, that unless they are of paramount necessity, which I have never believed, we should at once strike them out. I am afraid, too, there are many grave constitutional objections to them in whole or in part."

"To the opinion I treasure the opinion of Mr. Calhoun, and of Mr. Justice Johnson, might be added many others, but it is sufficient to have shown to your Excellency that the reclamations of slavery, made in an unfeigned tone of good will and courtesy (and as differently responded to), might have been satisfactorily met, by a numerous which not only the whole Governors of South Carolina, and two-thirds of the House of Representatives, believed would tend to repeal, but, what is more, the Senate of the land, and law, and which conceded less than the most eminent jurists of the State deemed just and wise.

It is very difficult, under existing circumstances, to avoid being impressed by the idea that some ulterior object, or concealed cause, must have influenced a result so hostile to Great Britain, and so adverse to communication with members of the Legislature, and the opinions I have heard generally expressed, led me to expect would have proved entirely different.

With a population of nearly 9,000 free persons of colour, and with the constant transit of travellers from other States and countries, it cannot be imagined that any slave in this city or State is uninformed of the existence of negro freedom, or of the propagandism of the friends of Slavery; no I doubt, from your Excellency's benevolent and wise views, that you will concur in the opinion that it is by kindness and by moral influence alone, Christian, and not by evidently futile attempts to perpetuate ignorance, that the bondsman may be found resigned to the state in which Providence has placed him.

I have had, on the other hand, opportunities of knowing how much ill-will, and what deep irritation, is caused among the white part of a crew, whose coloured companions have been seized, or given, and who are consequently assisted by slave labour, at great cost, in unloading and loading their vessels.

Commerce, as it is, has a lien, also, upon every credit, and as of suicidal policy, the allegation that the owners of wharf and dock labourers have attempted to interfere in a manner, which, not prejudating, too, the insinuation that it was feared to concede to some, what it was wished not to grant to others, I am at a loss to understand the motive. Those who would desire to maintain laws (were their legality even admitted) which not only are shewn, in their present shape, to be unnecessary, but which might be productive of the very danger they are designed to preclude.

On Saturday, and again on this day, the spectable has been exhibited in the streets of Charleston, of unoffending British seamen taken forcibly from the protection of the flag of their country and marched along as a gaol.

Your Excellency may believe me, that exhibitions of this nature, were it possible to suppose their continuance, will not tend to the benefit or to the honour of this State.

I abstain from commenting upon the great and evident advantage that the virtual admission that Commerce and so repugnant to the policy and needful to the maintenance of the institutions of S. Carolina, must give to the opponents of these institutions.

Considered in hope, Sir, that this subject would be treated as one of friendly consideration and concession, more than as a question of disputed law, or litigated rights; but I find that the Solicitor-General has chosen to meet it solely upon this basis, and the Legislature, by passing the Reports and Resolutions annexed to them, have become parties to the views and statements conveyed by them.

The "Report" and "Resolutions" passed by the Senate are based upon the alleged support of an opinion of Chief Justice Taney, of the Supreme Court of the United States. The Report adopted (with two similar Resolutions) by the House states that any question of the validity of the law "should be abandoned or referred to the Judges of the land, many of whom have already spoken with authority upon the principle involved."

Sir, I trust, I am doing the members of the Legislature the gross injustice of doubting but that they would therefore, individually and collectively, prefer the law of the United States, to which they have chosen to refer, should the subject, in accordance with their desire, be brought under its consideration—and that they would be very facilitate a full and fair hearing of the actual legal point at issue, before the high tribunal to which they have alluded.

The question of the privileges, under the Treaty of coloured British subjects arriving from Europe, would seem to be conceded in the "Report" to the British, "as regards the principle." Yet, "in fact," the 39 real commercial impediment arose—for it admits that if the effect of the law was such "as seriously to obstruct or embarrass the intercourse which the Treaty was intended to sanction and secure, this would be a fraud on the Treaty, and might justly be complained of as such."

I cannot assent to the principle that either a court or a component of a country is thus entitled to interpret at pleasure the plain words of a Treaty, or to be the judge of what is, or what is not, of embarrassment or obstruction to other nations.

The "serious obstruction" to the trade from the West Indies is not denied; but, the claim of Her Britannic Majesty's subjects in those Islands, to special protection, under the Treaty, and under the laws and Constitution of the United States, appears to have escaped the notice of the Solicitor-General. It exists, the illegality and injustice of the law must be, on their own showing, admitted by the Committee and the Legislature.

Unless the last clause of the first Article of the Treaty, quoted in my letter of the 10th, viz., "And, generally, the merchants and traders of each nation, respectively, shall enjoy the most complete protection, and security, for their commerce," can be proved to be compatible with the imprisonment of the master and crew of a trading vessel; and, unless on the assumption that the proclamation of the President of the United States, of October, 5th, 1830, declaring that the Ports of the United States are "open" to British vessels, from any port or place in the West Indies, from the Bahamas, and the Bermudas, and that "they shall be admitted with their cargoes, subject to no other or higher duty or tonnage, or impost, or any charge of any description whatever, than would be levied on vessels of the United States," is not grossly violated by a law which directs, under certain circumstances, the sale at auction, as slaves, of the mariners (who are often owners, on shares) of the vessel and cargo so ordered to be submitted, I will be obliged to conclude that Her Majesty's West Indian subjects are equally shielded, both by the Treaty, by the laws of the United States and by their proclamation, which invites the Federal Government the exclusive power of regulating commerce, and navigation.

If each State of this Union could legally, under the plea of police regulations, neutralize any part of a Treaty—the Constitution of the country, which declares that a Treaty shall be "the supreme law of the land," and that "it shall become a nullity without meaning, or power, and the United States would be rendered incapable of entering into any Treaties of commerce, or of alliance with Foreign nations. The State that this year obstructs commerce with the West Indies, might next year pass an act against the admission of emigrants from Great Britain, Ireland, or Germany.

Impediments, indeed, have already been attempted to be placed on Irish emigration.

It will, I trust, not be unknown to your Excellency, that the Supreme Court of the United States has recently, upon the words of the Treaty with Great Britain, declared null and void the acts of two States of the Union, imposing a tax upon emigrants, although to be used for unobjectionable purposes.

If this anomalous power were vested in the separate States of the Union, the consequence in present instance should have been by total exclusion from "entry," and not by offensive penalties when entered, a European nation should have been made in regard to vessels in distress; for I appeal without hesitation to your Excellency, if laws which direct a coloured man, whose wrecked ship has come, and recognised to have been twice previously in these ports, to be sold as a slave, are not repugnant to humanity and civilization?

But that eminent and lamented statesman, Mr. Calhoun, whose official opinion has, even on a point of the law of nations, proved in this case powerless with the Legislature of his native State, has emphatically declared that no such power, at variance with Treaty stipulations, can exist.

The Committee, in their Report, have (unintentionally, I feel assured) fallen into a grave error, and have founded upon it an argument of weight.

No "local law" of the Bermudas, unparticipated in by the whole British Empire, could have been alleged, in 1835, against a demand for the restoration or value of American slaves, stated to have been landed in that year from a vessel in distress.

The Imperial Act of Abolition declares that "on and after the 1st day of August, 1834, Slavery shall be, and is hereby, utterly and forever, abolished, and declared unlawful, throughout the British Colonies, plantations, and possessions abroad."

In the case of the Creole, the vessel was taken possession of, and restored to the owners, but the British law not acknowledging Slavery, the authorities could have no legal power to pursue and give up the slaves, who had all gained the shore.

The law of Jamaica, of the Bermudas, or of any other country under the British crown, cannot, with regard to British mariners, prevent the law of England. The law of the British Empire, and the law of the United States, are the laws referred to in the Treaty, as the "Laws and Statutes of the two countries respectively."

I may add here, that Chief Justice Taney's legal opinion will be found on reading the Decisions of the Court (in the 6th December, 1831), intimating to a British proprietor of a slave that the treaty between the two nations did not give him a right to demand the restoration of his slave from the United States.

The point, therefore, attempted to be urged, of the Treaty, as regards British slaves on British territory, is wholly alien to the question.

With regard to a further statement in the Report to the House, I would respectfully, as the passing of the law complained of, free coloured persons notoriously came without hindrance in British vessels to the State, and the consequence resulting—that I learn from the British Government having official notice, in 1827, of the intended continuance of the law, it had been communicated to them from the proper Federal authority, that the law was "null and void, for being against the Treaties, Laws and Constitution of the United States."

I remain, with no doubt of your Excellency's enlightened personal sentiments on this subject, and I have now, I believe, laid proof before you, that the opinions of many of the citizens of the State, the most distinguished for talent and patriotism, the present laws, affecting a class of H. B. M.'s subjects entering the ports of this State for legitimate commerce, are illegal, impolitic and unnecessary. There is yet, Sir, another cause, which must, in justice, be considered, it is that public opinion throughout the United States—in the South as in the North—is evidently opposed to it.

Look, Sir, at the position of the civilized world, and the influence of this greatest human power, look at the future of this great country, whose progress, under firm and wise guidance, can alone be limited by the universe, and consider the nations, or by each acts as these, and judge whether a system of legislation which, at best, but serves to shew the desire of evading, the injury of others, the due double and cost of an effective police against disturbers of the peace, can or ought to be maintained.

The nation must, at all risks, in the present day, enforce her Treaties within her boundaries, or she justly incurs a lasting moral fall in the esteem of civilized nations.

I have full faith in the government of the United States to carry out, with the universal support of the country, the stipulations of the Treaties, with foreign nations, in their integrity, and to enforce equally, in all parts of the Union, the laws and Constitution of the United States. Sir, to hold fast to the hope that the Legislature, and the people of this State (the sentiments of the majority of whom I do not conceive to accord with this proposition) will not countenance the representations made by Great Britain), will, on more mature consideration, unite in condemnation of the existing law.

I have the honour to be, with every sentiment of personal consideration,

Your Excellency's ob't serv't,

GEORGE MATHEW.

INTERVENTION.

THERE is a great deal of nonsense talked about Intervention. The mission of M. Kossuth to this country on this express errand has opened the floodgates of our national hypocrisy, and it comes upon us like a deluge. People really seem to think that the American people are really in danger of doing a generous action, and that they must be earnestly dissuaded from so unprecedented a thing. One would imagine that M. Kossuth was likely to do what Hotspur found so hard, viz, to "stir up a dish of skimmed milk to so honourable an action," as running a risk for a principle. Mr. Clay weeps over the possibility and entreats that we may be left the barning and shining light we now are to the nations of the Old World. M. Kossuth, whatever else he may be, is not a fool, and he has deceived himself in the hopes on whom he thought it worth his while to flatter a Joutrance, and the great masses that he fitly represents. The acting President, orators of all shades in both Houses of Congress, the leading newspapers of the two great parties, think this an occasion for their interposition, that this knot is intricate enough for them to descend "ex machina" to unloose it. Just as our priests, politicians and preachers seem to labour under the hallucination that the American people are just dying of mawaise honte, and that it is their especial mission to breathe into them a reviving good opinion of themselves. And M. Kossuth appears to have understood the nature of our national complaint so well that the doses of flattery administered by Fourth of July orators and Thanksgiving sermon-writers look infinitesimally homeopathic by the side of his enormous lotuseater too big for any but a Yankee swallow.

Now, why should not this country interfere when a people cry out for her intervention in Europe? She is the Model Republic, the only genuine article of the name, and why should she not encourage the manufacture abroad whenever it is attempted in earnest? The Allies, with England among them, intervened to restore the old state of things in France, and to discourage Revolution everywhere. Louis Napoleon intervened to put the Old Secret Lady again on her seant upon the seven hills. Nicholas intervened to maintain Austria and Austrian Slavery in Hungary, and to ready to march upon France, if his Uncle's Nephew is not able to maintain that true faith there, also. We are fond of following European fashions. There is no tuft-hunter like a Yankee, none who delight more in going to Court, having the entree of the Balls of the Nobility, and in taking off his hat to Royalty in the street. Why should we not follow this example? Are not Nicholas and M. Bonaparte right in their notions if they are sincere in their opinions? If the people of Europe are not fit to govern themselves, but must needs run madly into anarchy, if the wholesome restraints of patriarchal governments are removed, are they not justified in interfering to prevent such fearful results? If we have the same faith in our institutions that they have in theirs, if our system of government is the best prevailing over the world, when a good occasion arises? We have no objection to fighting—at least, with nations and tribes weaker than ourselves. If Republicanism is good, and Hungary is trying to get it, and Russia is interposing to hinder her, why should we not stand by and see fair play, at least, if we will not take off our coats and step into the ring? We are sure we can see none.

But we shall damage our trade! Well, suppose we do. Trade is not the Chief End of Man, we apprehend, in a glorious Republic like ours. There was no scruple on this head, in Mr. Clay's mind, at least, when he helped destroy the trade of New England by the War with England, in 1812. "Sailor's Rights," "the Honour of the Nation," were to be maintained than at the expense of any quantity of Northern shopkeepers. And that War was no Intervention, neither! We did not fly at John Bull's heels, like a yelping cur, to distract him from the fight he was maintaining with that excellent Ally of our Democracy, Napoleon Bonaparte! They did not then think of Washington's Farewell Address then! It was forty years nearer Washington's time, and all the men active in that Intervention have since listened to it with their own ears, had they been near enough. They were all old enough. And now should another case like that of the Hungarian struggle arise, why should we not use the strength which sixty years of growth have given us to give to other nations the blessings we brag of so much ourselves! All our antecedents are in favour of such a course. The only reason that can be given is, that we are afraid. We are not afraid of England when she had Napoleon on her hands to be sure; but Russia and Austria and France and Prussia, and all the rest of reactionary Europe upon ours, must needs give us pause. But why? The principle of the thing is the same. The only difference is that this would be a generous sacrifice of blood and treasure for the maintenance of the great principle of self-government, and not a mere oblation to a partisan victory. Mr. Clay had better weep over the bankruptcy which the Intervention of 1812 brought to thousands of New England homes, and for his Intervention to hinder South American Independence reaching the dangerous vicinity of Cuba and making it secure, instead, thus over the possibility and a brave self-devotion to a principle.

But Mr. Clay's appearance in the part of the Crocodile was quite an amateur performance. He knew well, no man better, the absolute moral (or immoral) impossibility of any such contingency occurring. No man has done more towards demoralizing the moral sense of the people than he, in his public opinion throughout the United States—in the South as in the North—is evidently opposed to it.

Look, Sir, at the position of the civilized world, and the influence of this greatest human power, look at the future of this great country, whose progress, under firm and wise guidance, can alone be limited by the universe, and consider the nations, or by each acts as these, and judge whether a system of legislation which, at best, but serves to shew the desire of evading, the injury of others, the due double and cost of an effective police against disturbers of the peace, can or ought to be maintained.

The nation must, at all risks, in the present day, enforce her Treaties within her boundaries, or she justly incurs a lasting moral fall in the esteem of civilized nations.

I have full faith in the government of the United States to carry out, with the universal support of the country, the stipulations of the Treaties, with foreign nations, in their integrity, and to enforce equally, in all parts of the Union, the laws and Constitution of the United States. Sir, to hold fast to the hope that the Legislature, and the people of this State (the sentiments of the majority of whom I do not conceive to accord with this proposition) will not countenance the representations made by Great Britain), will, on more mature consideration, unite in condemnation of the existing law.

I have the honour to be, with every sentiment of personal consideration,

Your Excellency's ob't serv't,

GEORGE MATHEW.

THE CASE OF SAMUEL WILLIAMS—END OF THE CHRISTIANA TRIALS.

THE trial of Samuel Williams, which commenced in Philadelphia, early last month, but which, in consequence of the illness of Judge Kane, has been delayed from that time till last week, is at length concluded. It was at first proposed to put the defendant upon trial for his life, upon a charge of treason, but the verdict of acquittal in favour of Hanway, and the discharge of the other prisoners, who were arraigned with him, so far mitigated the rancour of the prosecution, that the prisoner was finally put upon his trial on a charge of misdemeanor in obstructing the process of the United States under the Fugitive Slave Law, in giving information to the slaves of Gorsuch that they were about to be arrested. No full report of the evidence has, that we have seen, been published. We have seen the opening speech of Mr. Ashmead for the prosecution, showing the grounds of the indictment, and what the Government hoped to prove. The case, after argument by counsel, went to the Jury on Wednesday, the 4th inst. They were out all night without being able to agree upon a verdict, standing, till late in the morning, six for conviction, and six for acquittal. But on Thursday forenoon they rendered a verdict of NOT GUILTY.

Two other bills remain against Williams, but it is presumed that a nol. pros. will be entered in regard to them. The prosecutors are Gorsuch, his son Dennis, G. L. Ashmead and J. R. Ludlow for the United States; D. P. Brown, H. P. Kane and W. S. Pierce for defendant.

OPENING SPEECH OF GEORGE L. ASHMEAD.

May it please the Court, Gentlemen of the Jury—I present to your consideration a bill of indictment against Samuel Williams, charging him among other things, with unlawfully obstructing, hindering, and preventing Henry H. Kline, a duly authorized officer, from arresting a fugitive slave—with aiding, abetting and assisting the said fugitive slave to escape from the officer—with giving, blundering, and preventing the owner of said fugitive from arresting his slave—and with aiding, abetting, and assisting, and preventing the escape from his owner. There are other counts in the indictment, but the evidence to be introduced on the part of the United States will apply more particularly to the charges I have specifically mentioned.

The indictment arises under the seventh section of the act of Congress approved Sept. 18th, 1850, to be found in the Statutes at Large, of the thirty-first Congress, page 462. I shall now read the material portion of the section which immediately relate to the issue now before you. They are as follows: "And be it further enacted, That any person who shall knowingly and willingly obstruct, hinder, or prevent such claimant, his agent or attorney, or any person or persons lawfully assisting him, from arresting such fugitive from service or labour, either with or without process as aforesaid; or shall aid, abet, or assist such person so arrested to escape from such claimant, his agent or attorney, or any person or persons lawfully assisting as aforesaid, or attempt to do so, whether such rescue, shall be by force or by other means, or shall attempt to rescue such fugitive from such claimant, his agent or attorney, or any person or persons lawfully assisting as aforesaid, shall for either of said offences be subject to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and imprisonment not exceeding six months."

The facts in the case, as they will appear in evidence, I will now briefly narrate.

Henry H. Kline, a highly respectable citizen of Baltimore county, in the State of Maryland, was the owner of certain slaves, to wit, Noah Buley and Joshua Hamlin, [illegible] I will now ask to be read upon my own merits. But should the time arrive when I have occasion to think my presence unwelcome or in any sense an unfavorable one, I will quietly withdraw, and yield his place, fair enough, for any delicate and sensitive nature recoils at being thought an intruder.

I shall, then, rest, yours, &c,

DELIA A. WEBSTER.

OUR BOSTON Correspondent, in his letter in last week's paper, referred to the appearance of one Abraham Gunnings Drake, at the Annual Meeting of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society. The Boston Times thus reports the speech of that individual:

"Mr. Garrison came forward and said; We have heard observations from Mr. Gunnings, and Lady Rolleston, and thus you group them! The one, a poor insane woman, has taken—not from us, but from this everlasting credit if we could say he was insane too.

Why, among all the friends of the great reconstruction, not some one has come to this platform to defend him? It is free for all.

This invitation brought up Abraham Gunnings Drake, who took the platform as the defender. He was a perfect Rosring K. Rouser. His manner was hailed with roaring cheers. He struck a fierce attitude, and commenced in a tone of thunder. He mounted the platform like a stag at bay; he shot looks of terrific intensity upon the excited auditory. He illustrated his ideas—and he illustrated by Demosthenic energy, 'action, action, action.' After walking the platform in solemn silence for a while, the volcano of his eloquence burst forth. With arms extended, and inflated lungs, and veins of power, he exclaimed, 'I have come of my own free will to defend the abolition brother of the world, and I am going to give you a little information about that great Daniel who has been thrown into the lions' den for his philanthropy, who, with all his illustrious predecessor, he delivered from the den of their ferocious jaws.

'Who was the Declaration of Independence was signed, wasn't there Slavery? Yaas! Didn't Peter Faneuil advertise slaves in the city? Yes, sir-ree! What then? was it wrong? Go for my life! Was it right or wrong. Wrong commenced in the Garden of Eden—what of that? Is a rule right because it has the government stamp (good)? I go for the Fugitive Slave Law, and so does the great Daniel. When I first commenced the political course, I was determined to be consistent, I was determined to go for my Ked'ntry, and now I am determined to rescue the immortal Daniel from the rank and file of the rebellious Abolitionists. Who, because England only freed her black slaves in consequence of jealousy of the United States, and because she was a Monarchy, I will bend and foot, in all over, although I wouldn't vote for him! The orator stalked off the stage like a conqueror fresh from victory.

This unique defence of the great statesman convulsed the house with laughter. During the speech, the house with laughter. During the speech, Gunnings Drake stepped forward, but the applause was so uproarous he could not be heard. He stood beating the air for a few minutes, and then left.

LAW IN VIRGINIA.—A correspondent of the Ravenna (O.) Whig sends us the following statement in a letter from Western Virginia:

Since my last visit to this country, Clarksburgh, one of the most flourishing towns in this vicinity, has been the scene of a tragedy, which, in the opinion of the business part of the place has been consumed, and that, too, by incendiaries. A man by the name of Jackson, and his wife, lived in Clarksburgh, and had two boys and a free negro, are now in confinement charged with the offence. The evidence adduced before the examining court was, that Jackson and wife hired the boys, and ordered the girl to assist them in making the fires, threatening her with death if she refused or revealed any thing. One of the boys [illegible] confessed all, but unfortunately the evidence of the girl can only be taken in writing. The girl was found, after the fire, in a state of intense excitement since the fire, and the Sheriff is compelled to keep a strong guard around the prison to prevent a lynching party from hanging Jackson, his wife, and the free negro, who is believed to be one of a band of desperadoes.

BIRNEY THE APOSTATE.—Mr. Birney, it seems, instead of dying, as it was reported, last week, he had done, has committed the worse sort of coming out as an advocate of Colonization. He has published a pamphlet in favor of the Liberian Scheme, of which he is hailed as a convert by the advocates of that scheme of negro-expulsion. The pamphlet itself we have not seen, but shall endeavour to give our readers some idea of it when we get a sight of it.

HOW FREE A FREE COLOURED MAN IS IN MARYLAND.—The House of Delegates of Maryland adopted an order on the 2nd inst., with but two negative votes, requiring the Committee on colonization population to introduce the necessary bill, and the Committee accordingly reported a bill to compel all free negroes to hire themselves out by the year.

GOOD.—A coloured man by the name of Thompson has recently deposited amounting to seventy-five dollars, in a unit against a conductor on the Jefferson and Philadelphia Railroad, who attempted to eject him from the car, some time last summer, for preferring to occupy the seat he had paid for.

HAYNAUTIUS IN VIRGINIA.—A free coloured woman was committed to jail in Richmond, Va., on the 5th instant. She was charged with assaulting another woman, and attempted to make her escape in men's clothes. For this crime, and for being without free papers, she was condemned to receive THIRTY-NINE LASHES.

THE INDEPENDENCE of the penal colony on the Coast of Africa, to which men are banished for the crime of being born black, has been recognized by the Prussian Government.

BY AN ANTI-SLAVERY LECTURER.

NO. V.

CATTARAUGUS CO., N. Y., Nov. 27.

LET Ellicoville this morning for Waverly, where I now am. Was told I should find some staunch Anti-Slavery men here, and would, doubtless, have some good meetings. Was obliged to travel some thirty miles road, to accomplish ten or twelve, on a "hee-line," and this was the cheapest, quickest and easiest way But as this was the journey I had, (though I felt like walking it rather, because for grumbling. Passed through a portion of the "Allegheny Reservation," a territory reserved, by the Government, for the use of the remnant of the tribe of Seneca Indians, still living there. They are, I believe, about five hundred in number. They are, I believe, about five hundred in number. They are said to be, generally, dissipated and degraded, spending their time, usually, in hunting and fishing—stopping to perform common labour only when compelled by pecuniary necessity. There are honourable exceptions, however. I saw a number of them at the Village, where I had time to take a hasty view of them or conclusions, or offend the least degree of pleasure to the worthy man; viz.

1. The electing of men of genuine talent to the legislature, by the people of this country, is the exception, not the rule. 2. I feel myself engaged in a cause of no little one, though weak, can chase a thousand, how ever strong. It is not in my intellectual ability the man feared, but a small lump of lead, in the light of which, the haggard moral deformity of his opponent stood revealed. He had evidently calculated on meeting only Free Soil opposition. This, he had satisfied himself, he could manage. But Abolition argruments were quite another thing. 3. In the light of such arguments, whether the law was Constitutional, or whether some of its provisions were so formed as to endanger the liberties of those who had never been enslaved, were matters of comparatively small importance. The right of the Constitution, or the Congress, or the Devil, their father, or anybody and everybody, this side of heaven, or there either, to enslave men, was the great question to be settled. And the settlement of this, would settle the whole matter. The right of Congress to pass a law to enslave one man, established, and the right, under circumstances make it expedient—to enslave any man, is established. The right to enslave whom it pleases, by law, denied, and it has no right to enslave anybody. This was putting a too serious face on the question, altogether. Never did* men make greater exertions than did this man and his associates to keep the question within the limits of a narrow, soulless expediency. They did not wish to enter into the discussion of man's original right to liberty. They did not wish to go behind the Constitution to inquire about the rights of the people. They would not be drawn into a discussion of the inalienable right to liberty, declared in one of the "Bill of Rights," though, by the way, they were all along admitting this right, by admitting the detestable character of the Slave Law, and the wickedness of the system it was framed to uphold. But they reached the end of the rope of expediency, long before the close of the discussion last night; the reminder of the evening, they spent in the manner of pro-slavery men, generally, and Fugitive Slave Law men in particular, in finding fault with Abolitionists and saving the Union. What they will do for a position, Tuesday evening, the Lord only knows—unless his Satanic Majesty has made provisions for them against an emergency. We shall see.

P. S. The friends of freedom in Cattaraugus County have had the promise of a Convention, to be held in Ellicoville, and to be addressed by some of the strong men and women of New England, and other places, this present winter. Last fall, it was expected that this would take place, but it was put off to the winter. The people are becoming impatient. I have been expecting private intelligence on this subject, from head quarters for two months past, but have received none, though I have written to half the post offices in this region of country, to have letters forwarded. Our friends from the East are, I see, in this State, and have been some time, on their way to attend the Western New York, soon? And can they attend a Convention in Cattaraugus? Will they let us hear from them through the Standard, immediately? J. H. P.

TWENTIETH ANNUAL MEETING

OF THE

MASSACHUSETTS ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.

The twentieth Annual Meeting of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society was held in Boston, on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, January 28th, 29th and 30th, 1852.

The meeting commenced at the Melodeon, on the first-named day, and was called to order at 10 1-2 o'clock, by the President, FRANCIS JACKSON.

Cornelius Bramhall and Samuel May, Jr., were chosen Assistant Secretaries.

Opportunity for the usual silent prayer being given, prayer was offered by John M. Spear, of Boston.

Samuel Philbrick, Treasurer of the Society, made his Annual Report, of receipts and expenditures. The whole amount of receipts for the year was $6,326 19. Expenditures, $6,454 55. The balance remaining in the treasury, January 1st, 1852, $640 07. The Report was certified by the Auditor of the Society, Edmund Jackson, as having been examined, and found correct and duly vouched.

On motion of C. Bramhall, the Report was accepted, by a unanimous vote.

Voted, That Committees on Business, on Finance and on the Nomination of Officers for the ensuing year, be nominated by the President.

The following persons were nominated a Committee on Business, and chosen:

William Lloyd Garrison, Wendell Phillips, Charles C. Burleigh, Charles L. Remond, Parker Pillsbury, John M. Spear, Daniel Foster, Lucy Stone, Sarah H. Pugh, Abby Kelley, Foster, was afterwards added.

The following were nominated, and chosen, a Committee of Finance:

Ezra Lovell, Jr., Jos. N. Buffum, Nathaniel B. Spooner, Elbridge Sprague.

The chair was taken by Effingham L. Capron, of Waterford, one of the Vice Presidents of the Society.

Edmund Quincy, on behalf of the Board of Managers, presented their Annual Report, from which he read extracts. The Report gave a detailed sketch of the history of the cause, and of the operations of the Society, during the year past.

Voted, That the Report be laid on the table, and printed.

Wendell Phillips, from the Business Committee, reported the following Resolutions:

1. Resolved, That as citizens of Boston and the Commonwealth we record our deep disapprobation and indignant protest against the surrender of Thomas Sims by this city, its sanction of the accursed Law, and Sims by this city, its sanction of the accursed Law, lying policy of the Fugitive Slave Law, which has been made to act as a bloodhound, to the slaves, Christian, Mohammedan, and avowed violation of the laws of God—the wealth for the basest of all purposes—slave-trading—the filling of slave-ships, that State and Mill-street might make money.

2. Resolved, That in the circumstance of the case we will not allow us to believe that this infamous decree was passed by the City Government of Boston; and then as the act of the City Government, we do not feel the reflection that the fawning sycophancy who the Cotton Lords have born on the Peninsula granted the Mayor's request, and that the facts go to show that the Mayor has been blotted, but all the facts go to show that in this, as in all his life, he was and is, and therefore too shuffling tool of the Southern Slave Power.

3. Resolved, That we do not forget, in estimating Sewell.

4. Resolved, That we do not forget, in estimating the character of the professed Christians of Boston, the disgraceful and melancholy fight of God's people through this dismal and melancholy night of the Lord, they upheld a merciless people in the execution of so inhuman a deed.

5. Resolved, That in the rescue of Shadrach, the manly and successful resistance to Gorsuch and his bloodhounds, and the noble attitude of the city of Syracuse, we see cheering evidence that the love of Liberty and the reverence for Law have not died out in the land.

6. Resolved, That when we consider the critical state of parties and the public mind in relation to the principles of the fearful struggle going on between the principles of liberty and those of a merciless despotism—the chance of the one being a Spartan band, and those of the other a Persian host; when we consider also the anxious expectation with which the coming of Louis Kossuth was watched, the momentous weight attached to his lightest utterance, the unprecedented ovation of a people, the immense popularity of one of leading statesmen, his endorsement, in such glowing terms, of the Mexican system of human bondage, his assailed for and manfully, and boldly, rebuke of a fellow-country, to the monstrous provisions of the Fugitive Slave Law, his hardly disguised censure of the Abolitionists, as falsely and rashly, and unnecessarily, for the cause of humanity and human rights, injurious to the Slave, and serious to aid, fatal to his own fame, in worldly phrase, "worse than a crime, it is a folly," for he supposed such a course will give him either sincere sympathy or cordial aid, and that it would add a blot on the dark brow of American Slavery, that she has succeeded in drawing in the lap of her temptations another of the great historic characters of the age, and left him 'to grind in the mill' of her infamous service.

In the time of the morning session having expired, the Society adjourned to 2 1-2 o'clock, P. M.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON.—Met according to adjournment, the President in the Chair. The Resolutions reported in the morning being in order, George N. Fetnam, a colored man, delivering agenia of the Society, spoke in their support, including some account of his experience as a lecturer. He spoke of the high satisfaction and benefit he had received, while accompanying that eloquent and fearless advocate of the cause, George Thompson, into the State of New York and Canada. Spoke of the early part of last year. He also adverted to the various successes he had had while lecturing as an agent in the States of Maine and Massachusetts.

PARKER PILLSBURY, of New Hampshire, spoke in support of the Resolutions, and expressed the hope that the Society, in celebrating anniversary celebration we are commencing, would prove true to its duty; that it would shake the great and crying waste of the country, teaching the way of life, of freedom and of salvation to the thousands and tens of thousand who have outgrown the bondage of sect and party, who have thrown off the chains of a dead church and a heartless religion, and are struggling to come into the true light and to the true worship of God.

JOHN RAND, of Milton, said he responded very heartily to what had been said, though his friend Pillsbury had used some expressions which might be misunderstood. He said he was, he hoped, a Christian; he hoped he was a friend to the slave; he hoped to die such; and he came to a Christian, he was therefore an Abolitionist. For fifteen years, he had been in sympathy with this Society; he had been ready to confess his short-comings in duty; he felt he had not long to live, and he was resolved to devote himself more fully and more fully to the cause of Christian and as Abolitionist. Look on me, he said, all of you, and hear me avow myself an Abolitionist, a friend and reader of the Liberator, who admires and loves the pure Christian doctrine which the Liberator maintains (although often decried by those who profess to be disciples of Christ) and whose prayer is that I may devote myself more completely to the Anti-Slavery work, ready to hear the reproach of Christ and of the truth, and to bear the cross of Christ and of the slave.

P. PILLSBURY said a few words by way of explanation. When missionaries go to foreign lands, and denounce the abominable practices prevailing there, they do not feel bound frequently to stop and say, But understand I believe in the Bible; when I denounce your idolatry and cannibalism, I do not mean to denounce pure religion, or anything else that is good. So here. We have been accused of denouncing the Church and the Christianity—and that religion is protecting under its ample folds, sins and sinners of the vilest stamp. It is apologizing for, and bringing the name of God and of Christ to justify, the grossest abominations, the most terrible wrongs against men, and the most flagrant contempt of the laws of God. When we denounce this thing, is it necessary to explain that we do not mean to denounce the truth of God and the righteousness of Christ.

JOHN M. SPEAR defined some of his own experience as a bearer of the Fugitive Slave Law, and had met with many professed Christians—ministers and others—who would give him no aid, and would not permit their children to be present in their pulpits, because he was a friend of Wendell Phillips and Theodore Parker.

CHARLES C. BURLEIGH said he was well pleased with the advice often given as by many who profess to have made great attainments in religion, that we should be content our reform not to Christian one. What is 'Christian way?' Listen to Jesus, when he arraigns the hypocritical religious teachers of his day as hypocrites and criminals; not going into the kingdom of heaven themselves, and hindering those who would go, by generation of vipers, &c. We are told, too, that the Church must reform the world. Indeed! Is the church which upholds Slavery, and other kindred wrongs, the fit power to lift the world out of these wrongs. The church which is to reform the world, we have been taught, is that concerning which the gates of hell shall not prevail, not one which becomes itself the advocate of the worst doctrines of hell. The true church must drive its principles home to the hearts of those who that church which is the 'chief hulwark of American Slavery.'

Adjourned to 7 1-2 o'clock, P. M.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.—Edmund Quincy, one of the Vice Presidents, in the chair.

The resolutions before the Society were read by the Secretary.

Parker Pillsbury and Wendell Phillips spoke ably and eloquently in their support.

A phonographic report, by J. M. W. Yerrinton, of these speeches, and of those made on the two subsequent evenings, will be published as soon as possible, in pamphlet form, therefore, refrain from giving you an outline of those speeches.

Adjourned to Thursday morning, 10 o'clock.

THURSDAY.

Met at the Melodeon, according to adjournment. The President, in the chair, in accordance with a previous vote, nominated the following persons a Committee to report a suitable list of officers for the Society, for the ensuing year, and the persons chosen said Committee:

Edmund Quincy, of Norfolk Co.;
Effingham L. Capron, of Worcester Co.;
William Jackson, of Boston;
Geo. B. Simonds, of Middlesex Co.;
William Durfee, of Bristol Co.;
Johnson Brewer, of Plymouth Co;
Addison Everett, of Hampshire Co.;
Joshua B. Robbins, of Barnstable Co.;
Jasper H. York, of Suffolk Co.;
Francis Wood, of Hampden Co.

The resolutions reported in the morning session of the first day of the meeting was addressed by Nathaniel H. Whiting, of Marshfield.

Mrs. Lucy N. Colman, of E. Island, spoke of the injurious influence of many of the Boston churches, and adduced the instance of a young friend of here, who had been corrupted in principle by the preaching of the Boston churches with which he was connected, so to come to the support of the Fugitive Slave Law, which he had been taught to abhorrence, and had abandoned as inhuman and unchristian, when first enacted.

WENDELL PHILLIPS, from the Business Committee, reported the following Resolutions:

1. Resolved, That all friends of the cause, in attendance at these sessions, be requested to contribute the amount of one dollar each, or so much thereof as may be in their power, to defray the necessary expenses of this annual meeting—for which purpose they will be called upon, from time to time, by the members of the Finance Committee.

Resolved, That we urge upon all the friends of the cause here assembled, to pay attention to meet the exigencies of the time, by taxing themselves, and appealing to those about them for more money, and more, to send in offering liberally, and to use the printed page throughout land now awaking, as one is, to the momentous importance of the slave question.

After a few remarks on the subject, Mr. Phillips moved that the consideration of the second of these two resolutions be made the special business of the Society, at 10 o'clock. Adopted, unanimously.

W. L. GARRISON referred to what a previous speaker had said of Moses Stuart, of Andover, lately deceased. What enormous sins have been perpetrated in his name, and who merits the severest censure more than the man who taxed his ingenuity to find a sanction to the Fugitive Slave Law, declared that even in the fourth commandment Slavery was provided for, and who had exerted his great influence to reconcile the American people to the Fugitive Slave Law?

Mr. G. next spoke of the course which Louis Kossuth had pursued, since he had been in this country. He had expected a friend of universal freedom, and yet he was called upon to see the three million, two hundred thousand slaves in the land, or say one world's tread thousand slaves in the land, or say one world's tread thousand slaves in the land, or say one world's tread

JOHN STERLING.*

IN TWO PARTS—PART I.

A hard-like spirit, beautiful and swift.

"Who was John Sterling?" is a question we have more than once heard put since the announcement of his biography by Carlyle. Sterling! was he some hero? or does Carlyle, who so often speaks through parentheses of his own invention, mean by Sterling some Anti M'Crowler, Plugson of Undershot, or Sir Jabesh Windhap? No! John Sterling was a veritable man—a living, struggling, hard-working man—a really loving and lovable man—one who took captive the hearts of even the sternest, and bound them to him by strong ties of friendship. He seems to have been one of those beautiful natures that carry about with them a charm to captivate all beholders. He was full of "high-minded enterprise, promise, full of enthusiasm; and seem to be on the high-road towards honour, fame, and glory, when suddenly their career is cut short by death, and their friends are left in wailing and lamenting.

Just such another character was Charles Pemberton—a man of somewhat kindred genius to Sterling—who had done comparatively little, but had excited great hopes among a circle of ardent friends and admirers, whom he had riveted to him by certain indefinable graces and intellectual charms, and whom he was stricken down by death, and, like Sterling, left only a few scattered "Remains" to be judged by. Poor Lamb, too, died just at the time when the world the promise of one of its greatest men, but not before he had sent down into the future, strains of undying power. Shelley, too! What a loss was there! What glorious promise of a Man did he not offer! But the names of the great, who have died in youth, are more than can be told: as Shelley sang—

"The good die first,
While they whose hearts are dry as summer's dust
Burn to the socket."

But what of Sterling? What did he do? What has he left as a legacy to us by which to know and remember him?

We have two lives of him, written by two of his many intimate friends and devoted admirers—Archdeacon Hare and Thomas Carlyle. That two such men should have written a life of Sterling, would prove that something in the character and career more than ordinary. Archdeacon Hare's came first: his work was in two volumes, containing a deal of Sterling's and Hare's own. John Sterling with a memoir of his life. On reading that Life, interesting and beautiful though it was, one could not helpfully feel there was a great deal of unnecessary unfold, and that the tone adopted in speaking of John Sterling's opinions on religious subjects was unnecessarily apologetic. It seems to have been this circumstance which had induced Carlyle to write his Life. "Archdeacon Hare," says Carlyle, "takes up Sterling as a clergyman merely. Sterling, I think, was a clergyman for exactly eight months. But he was a man, and had relation to the Universe for thirty years; and it is in this latter character, or what he was in this latter character, that I shall have to speak, and that we wish to know him. His battle with hereditary Church formulas was severe; but it was by no means his one battle with things inherited, nor indeed his chief battle; neither according to my observation of what I was in a necessarily delineated or summed up in this book. A life of Sterling rather is here wanted to be presented to hero; withering bewildered amid heaps of what you call Hebrew Old-clothes; wrestling, with impotent impossibility, to free itself from the baleful incubus, as it had been its one function in life: who, in this miserable figure, would recognise the brilliant, lovable, and powerful John Sterling, with his ever-flowing wealth of ideas, fancies, imaginations; with his frank affections, inexhaustible hopes, audacities, activities, and general radiant vivacity of heart and intelligence, which made the presence of him as the illumination and inspiration wherever he went? It is too bad. Let a man be honestly forgotten when his life ends; but let him be merely forgotten in this way. To be hung up as an ecclesiastical scare-crow as a target for heterodox and orthodox to practice archery upon, is no fate that can be due to the memory of Sterling."

And so Carlyle determined to give this more catholic portraiture of his deceased friend. Let us now narrate the incidents and the more prominent features of Sterling's life.

The life is that of a literary man, and presents comparatively few incidents. Even as a literary man, he was never at any time a notoriety, and his name never filled the mouths of men, nor was seen in the newspapers. He was comparatively unknown, except by his own circle of ardent admirers. We give a few facts about his early history.

Sterling was born at Kaimoe Castle, in the island of Bute, Scotland, in 1806. His parents, both of whom were both of Scotch extraction; the mother was somewhat proud of being a descendant of Wallace, the Scottish patriot. Edward Sterling, the father, pursued farming; he had been a militia captain, and took to it as a calling, by way of helping out the family income. From Bute, he removed to Llanblethian, in Glamorganshire, in 1809, where the family remained till 1814. Here the young Sterling's childhood was nurtured amid forms of wild romantic beauty. But his father, the captain, was an ardent-minded, active man, and could ill confine himself to the small details of Welsh farming. His thoughts were always in the newspapers with newspapers. He wrote a pamphlet. He sent letters to the Times, signed Vetus, which were afterwards thought worthy of being collected and reprinted. The captain went further. He left his farm in Wales, and proceeded to Paris, with the project of acting as foreign correspondent for the Times and other English newspapers. From Paris, he wrote that they stand some eight months, until the sudden return of Napoleon from Elba, when they had to decamp to England as fast as possible. John Sterling returned to London, where he finally settled; and before long became a very notorious, if not a distinguished personage. His correspondence with the Times newspaper grew closer, until at length he became extensively known as "The Thunderer of the Times," and was publicly lashed by O'Connell in that character. Sterling, in 1817, returned to the great agitator's compliments with full interest. The character and history of this Times editor—a great power in his day—are given at some length by Carlyle, who seems to dwell upon the subject with much pleasure. Indeed, it forms one of the most delightful and interesting parts of the Life.

The boy was schooled in London, and grew as boys like him will grow; he was quick, clever, cheerful, gallant, generous, self-willed, and rather difficult to manage. A short letter of his to his mother is given in the biography, written when he was twelve years showing that he had "run away" from his home at Hackthorpe, to Dover. The scamp had been some slight or indignity put upon him which he could not bear. But he was brought home, and like other "slights" it was soon forgotten. Then at 14, he was, he was a great reader in the promiscuous line; reading Edinburgh Reviews, cart-loads of novels, and "reading like Ulysses among the palaces, Homer in the mountain dung." At sixteen he was sent to Glasgow University, where he lived with some of his mother's connections. Then, at nineteen, he proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he had for his tutor Julius Hare, now the archdeacon his biographer.

Though not an exact scholar, Sterling became well and extensively read, possessed great facilities of assimilation for all kinds of mental diet. His studies were irregular and discursive, but extensive and encyclopedic. At Cambridge he soon fell into friendly connection with many afterwards distinguished men—Frederick Maurice, Richard French, John Kenelm Tennyson, Charles Buller, Mitchell, and others, who were afterwards in life his fast friends. Sterling was a ready and a brilliant speaker at the Union Club; and already began to exhibit strong "Radical" leanings, displaying on small daring in his attacks upon established ideas and things. "His short," says Carlyle, "he was a young and ardent soul, burning with hope and joy into a world which was infinitely beautiful to him, though overlaying with falsities and foul cobwebs as world never was before; overlaying, overshadowing, to the zenith and the nader of it, by incredible uncredited traditions, solemnly sordid hypocrisies, and beggarly delirious old and new; which latter class of objects he was clearly in part sent to every noble heart to expend all its lightnings and energies in burning up without delay, and sweeping into their native Chaos of such a Cosmos as this was."

It was Sterling's intention to take a degree in Law at Cambridge, but, like many other of his intentions, it came to nothing; and after a two years' residence, his university life ended. What to do next? He has grown into manhood, and must have a "profession." What is it to be? Is it to be the Law, or the Church? or, is he to enter the career of trade, and make money in it, thereby to secure "the temporary hallelujah of flunkeys." His "Radical" notions gave him a deep aversion to the pursuit of the Law; and as for the Church, at that time, he had sported ideas at Cambridge about its "black dragoon," which showed that his leanings were not that way. The true career for Sterling, in Carlyle's opinion, was Parliament, and it was possibly with some such ultimate design in view, that Sterling and his friends had set up for the purpose of opening the trade to India. But the association did not live long, and the secretaryship began.

One other course remained open for Sterling—the career of Literature, and he plunged into it. Joining his friend Maurice, the copyright of the Athenæum (which Silk Buckingham had some time before established) was purchased, and there he printed his first literary effusions, many of which are preserved in his biography. Sterling's Collegiate career, imperfect, but singularly beautiful and attractive papers, as for instance, The Lycian Painter, containing seeds of great promise. Yet, as Carlyle observes, "a grand melancholy is the prevailing impression they leave; partly as if, while the surface was so blooming and opulent, the heart of it was in some sense, sad, and cold. The writer's heart is indeed still too vacant, except of beautiful shadows and reflexes and resonances; and is far from joyful, though it wears commonly a smile." He himself afterwards to speak of this as his "period of darkness."

The Athenæum did not prosper in Sterling's hands. He did not succeed in conducting a newspaper, which is absolutely necessary for the success even of a literary journal. So the Athenæum was transferred to Mr. Dilke, who, died just at the time of Sterling's But the Athenæum had introduced Sterling into the literary life of London, which tended to confirm him in his pursuits. Among the celebrities with whom he was thus familiar introduced, was Coleridge, whose home at Highgate Hill he often visited, and there he listened to that eloquent talker playing the magician with his wonderful and sublime shadows—a scene that set there as a kind of Magus, girt in mystery and enigma, whispering strange things, uncertain whether could be heard or not. The influence which Coleridge exercised upon the religious thinking of his day was unquestionably great, dreamy and speculative though he was; but whether it will survive, whether the religious life of the world will be advanced in any way by Coleridge's lofty musings, is matter of great doubt to many; because glorious though the Coleridge's lofty voice was, he has now died, and that it died away in sound, leaving no solid, appreciable, practical, intelligible meaning behind it. But it was an influence which he indeed had. Certain it was that Sterling, notwithstanding his "Radical" notions, was the time deeply influenced by his interchange of thoughts with Coleridge, and by what Carlyle calls "three-refined pabulum of transcendental moonshine." This sufficiently appears in the novel of Arthur Coningsby, which Sterling wrote in 1830—his only prose fiction.

About this time, Sterling deeply interested himself in the fate of some poor Spanish emigres, driven out of their native country, and now wandering about, then vegetating about Somer's Town, beating the pavement in Euston Square. Their chief was Don Torrijos, with whom Sterling had become intimate, and to whose fortunes he took a warm interest. Torrijos was a leading, revolutionist and liberalist in Spain. But unfortunately, Sterling was little rested by the romance of the thing and he also warmly sympathized with the sentiments of the old patriot, and he determined to raise some money for friends; money was collected; arms were bought; a ship was provided by Lieutenant Boyd, an Irishman; the ship was in the Thames, taking in its armament, when the police suddenly appeared on board, and the vessel was seized and its stores confiscated. Torrijos, Boyd, and some others, did afterwards manage to land in Spain; where they met with an exceedingly tragical ending.

But something else issued from this Spanish misadventure, which was of more value. Sterling became acquainted with the Misses Barton, the daughters of Lieutenant-General Barton of the Life Guards—very delightful young ladies. He seems to have excited considerable interest in the young ladies, and the romantic feeling, for when he went to take leave of her, to embark in the projected Spanish invasion, the following conversation took place:

"'You are going, then, to Spain? To rough it amid the storms of war and perilous insurrection; and with that weak health of yours: and—we shall see no more in London!' Thus the Miss Barton, all her gaiety gone, the dimpling softness become liquid sorrow, and the musical ringing voice one wail of woe, spoke to Sterling, who was her friend in authority. Here was one possibility about to be strangled that made unexpected noise! Sterling's interview ended in the offer of his hand, and the acceptance of it!

So Sterling married the Spanish exile, and married Susannah Barton. But scarcely was he married ere he fell seriously ill—so ill that he lay utterly prostrate for weeks, and his life was long despaired of. The disease was a gradual and insidious decline of health and illness, rampant good spirits and prostrate feebleness. His lungs were affected, and consumption was apprehended—indeed, he was dying. The doctors, however, gave hopes of him—only it was necessary he should remove to a warmer climate. His family had inherited a valuable property in the West Indies, at St. Vincent, whither he went to reside in 1831, and remained in that beautiful island, under the hot sun of the tropics, for about fifteen months, returning, very greatly improved in health. From thence he went to Bonn, in Germany, where he met with his old friend and quondam tutor, Julius Hare, then a tutor, and now Dean of Hereford, moreover, in Sussex. With him, Sterling had much serious talk on religious matters.

Sterling, still under the influence of the Coleridgian views, and Hare, still working within him at St. Vincent and since, expressed to Mr. Hare a wish to enter the Church, as a minister, which Mr. Hare strongly dissuaded him from, on the ground of his to his own oracy at Herstmoreseaux, which was then vacant. Shortly after, he returned to England, was ordained deacon at Winchester, in 1832, and was appointed curate immediately after, entering earnestly on the duties of that calling. But this lasted only for a few months, when Sterling, in the language of "misgivings," doubts, and distresses of mind, compelled him to withdraw, and he left London again, finally to embark on the great sea of literature, which he had long in view. Carlyle designates his acceptance of the curacy as "the crowning error" of Sterling's life. "No man of Sterling's veracity" he says, "who had he clearly conceived his own heart, or had his own heart been capable of clearly responding, and not been dazzled and bewildered by transient fantasies, and theosophic moonshine, could have undertaken this function. His heart would have answered: 'No, thou canst not. What is incredible to thee, thou shalt not, at thy soul's peril, attempt to believe! Believe rather for a refuge, or death, or hell, to perdition, if thou must—but not with a lie in thy mouth!'"

Carlyle twice heard Sterling preach, and thus describes the occasions: "It was in some new college-chapel in Somerset House; a very quiet small place, the audience student-looking youths with a few elderly people, perhaps some of the friends of the preacher's. The discourse, delivered with a grave sonorous composure, and far surpassing in talent the usual run of sermons, had with much in it of genuine beauty, as still recollect, and bespoke dignity and piety of mind; but gave me the impression rather of artistic excellence than of inward reality of the kind. Sterling returned with us to Chelsea that day; and in the afternoon we went on the Thames Putney-ward together, we two with my wife; under the sunny skies, on the quiet water, and in the cheery talk, the remembrance of which is still present enough to me.

"This was the purely my only specimen of Sterling's preaching. Another time, late in the same autumn, I did indeed attend him one evening to some church in the City, where he preached to a crowded house; but by Wren, as he carefully informed me—but there, in my wearied mood, the chief subject of reflection was the almost total vacancy of the place, and how to escape without being observed by acquaintances and prayerbooks; and of the sermons I retain no image. It came up in the way of banter, if he ever urged the point, that I should hear Sterling preach; but very seldom did, and at length never, what a specimen we once had of bright lamps, gilt prayerbooks, baselined pews, Wren-built churches—and how, in almost all directions, you might have fired a musket through the church, and hit no Christian life. A terrible outlook, indeed, for the apostolic labourer in the brick-and mortar line!"—Life of Sterling.

THE VIRGINIA MAROONS.

BY EDMUND JACKSON.

In the West India Islands, but more especially in Jamaica, Cuba and St. Domingo, there was a class of Slaves; it was common for fugitive slaves to seek shelter and security in the mountainous and secluded portions of those islands, where they constituted a small community, and maintained their freedom at the cost of much privation and, probably, frequent suffering. They were at constant war with the planters, and never hesitated to make use of, what are the royal tigers in the jungels of Bengal. They not unfrequently, however, retaliated upon their persecutors the full measure of vengeance which was meted out to themselves.

Hunting the Maroons as they were termed, was a matter of common occurrence, when their depredations upon the plantations of the planters became troublesome; for their notions of meum and tuum were, of course, very similar to those of their slaveholding taskmasters, the state of mind which had prevailed previous to emancipation, and such is now substantially the case, I apprehend, in Cuba, and, indeed, in all slaveholding communities. It is not, I think, generally known, however, that our Southern States contain many communities of greater or less numbers, very similar to those of Jamaica and Cuba, though designated by the name of Maroons, but as "gangs of runaway negroes."

The Atlantic shaveholding States, where these gangs are found, have, of course, to afford any mountainous regions to which the Fugitive can resort and set at nought the efforts of his pursuers. Necessity, however, has compelled the Fugitive to do this, in fact; and in lieu of almost inaccessible mountainous regions, the Fugitive avails himself of the numerous and extensive swamps and low grounds, with which abound the Southern States, and which are found in every section of the Slave States.

These swamps are, for the most part, submerged with water the year round, but contain many islands of dry land, which are raised above the high water mark; and here the Fugitive erects his hut, cultivates, to the best of his very limited means, patches of corn and other vegetables, and, if he succeeds, rears a large family of children. Occasionally, when necessity presses hard, he makes a foray by night into the adjacent plantations for provisions, and helps himself without leave asked or granted. When, however, they seek refuge in swamps of small dimensions and not difficult to penetrate, they are frequently hunted down and compelled to leave the country; the latter fate overtakes them, a part of the gang being killed on the spot, and the remainder escaping, for the time, to encounter at some future day the doom of their fellows:

The great Dismal Swamp, which lies near the eastern shore of Virginia, is well known to all the folk stretches quite into North Carolina, contains a large colony of negroes, who originally obtained their freedom by the grace of God, and their own determined resolution to resist the efforts of their owners, or by the help of the Colonisation Society. How long this colony has existed, what is its amount of population, I have not the means of ascertaining. Fugitives, and what the descendants of Fugitives, are questions not easily determined; nor can we ascertain the number of Fugitives that may have, no doubtedly existing in the vicinity of this colony, by reason of the decided objections of those best enabled to gratify our curiosity, to some extent at least, by furnish us information respecting it. It might be used by Abolitocrists for their purposes, as one of them frankly said when questioned about the matter.

Nevertheless, some facts, are, at least, an approximation towards the truth of them, are known respecting this Dismal Swamp community of blacks, who have won their freedom and established themselves securely in the midst of the largest slaveholding State of the South; for from this extensive swamp there never has been, at all, a successful raid, by the chivalry of Virginia, so far as I know, have never yet ventured a slave hunt in the Dismal Swamp, nor is it probable that they would, if they dare, attempt to expel these Fugitives from it. This may appear extravagant. But when it is known how long a much less numerous and powerful tribe of Indians in glades of Florida against the forces of the United States, and how much blood and treasure it cost to expel them finally, we may find a sufficient reason for the forbearance of the Slave Dominion towards the community of Fugitives, domiciliated in their midst. From the character of the population it is reasonable to infer that the Slave Dominion has never charged himself with the duty of taking the census of the swamp, and we can only estimate the number of the population by conjecture, which may serve to indicate it. Of these, perhaps the trade existing between the city of Norfolk and the Swamp may furnish the best data for a conjecture. A steamer, which General Washington was one of the projectors, traverses length wise through the Swamp, and connects the waters of the Chesapeake with those of Albemarle Sound in North Carolina. Along the line of this canal are located a rough set of traders, whose entire trade is with the Maroons of the Swamp. These traders are constantly receiving supplies and convey the produce of the Swamp, principally if not entirely, to Norfolk. The articles which the negroes require are, for the most part, salted provisions, Indian corn, coarse cloths and tools; and what they furnish in payment are chiefly staves and shingles.

These have been established a trade between Norfolk and the Fugitives, which is wholly contraband, and which would subject the white participants in it to lawful punishment if it could be made to appear. For, throughout the slave States, it is an offence by law, of the gravest character, to have any dealings whatever with runaway negroes. The law says, "and you may guess them slaves unless you can show sufficient reason to the contrary."

Such, then, is the Dismal Swamp, and its inhabitants, which, I suppose, amount to, at least, a thousand souls. Of the Fugitives, I know, of course, nothing. Along the line of this canal are located a rough set of traders, whose entire trade is with the Maroons of the Swamp. In all these United States, and the public opinion of the South, is of which has never yet been, and, we think, never will be, polluted by the track of the slave-hunter.

THE POSITION OF WOMAN,

WITH REGARD TO MEDICAL SCIENCE.

MRS. C. H. DALL, [says the Boston Commonwealth], has an able article on this subject in the Water Cure Journal, for the present month, from which, it which will be read with interest. Mrs. Dall has often illustrated in her own case, the arguments she makes in behalf of the capacity of women, and the duty of giving them a full opportunity for a thorough education:

"Since the beginning of history, the lives of eighty-nine women are on record, not only for their virtues, but capable of extended medical practice, have been written. Fifty-two of these women were French, forty-one were Italians, twenty-two were Germans, twenty-eight were English, twenty-two were Spanish, and twenty-three were Dutch. Of these, twenty were remarkable for their contributions to medical information and general literature; ten received the degree of M. D from colleges of high standing; and seven only could have had the opportunity of blending with their sympathies and affections, for only seven were wives, mothers, or daughters of surgeons. When we say that we know something of eighty-nine women devoted to medical science, we do not mean that to larger number have made themselves distinguished, but that a goodly number of study will yield a clear and satisfactory account of these. Little more than a dozen names have come down to us from the period preceding the Christian era. The history of Agnodike has already been presented to you, and four other names may be mentioned which will possess a general interest. They are those of Aspasia, Artemisia of Karia, Cleopatra, and Elpinikke. The accounts of Aspasia are clear and satisfactory; but it is not doubted that Aspasia the midwife was the Aspasia of Pericles. The period at which she lived, the talent she evinced, and the fascinations ascribed to her, have, however, given rise to the conjecture. Artemisia was the Queen who assisted Xerxes so boldly at the battle of Salamis. In his first naval engagement, Xerxes refused to follow her advice, but when misfortune had taught him eye, he again sought her. She advised retreat. To the pride of Xerxes, that was too humiliating. When the engagement began, her conduct was so distinguished, that Xerxes, who looked on, said that the only men in the battle were the women. Her boldness drew upon her a hot pursuit, and perceiving herself inadequate to the emergency, she baited Greekian colours, and attacked a small Persian ship. The manœuvre, though only half understood in the confusion of the hour, insured her safety. The Greeks forgave her, and, instead of her disgrace, Xerxes exclaimed was "Women have become masculine, but men have become women!" Cleopatra, the Queen of Egypt, found a place in the pursuit of Mr. Browning, and, like Artemisia, she was a woman of great and military undertakings, to write several books. Of these, history preserves the name of but two. Elpinikke was a Roman lady, who made a work on the Art of Dress. In Greece, Elpinike, the daughter of Cimon, and sister of Miltiades, is known to have pursued the profession. So sacred was the position of a midwife, that at this era, queens, princesses, and priestesses at the altar, did not hesitate to perform its functions, and long after, at the Christian era, when the purity of Joan of Arc was called in question, it was not a college of surgeons, but five women of the noblest blood, who made the inquiry which established her reputation, which wiped away the aspersions. Yrotuis is the earliest among modern midwifes, of whom we find any distinct account. She was a Greek, and lived in Rome, where she practised in the 3d century. She published several works, and one of them, "De Mulierum Passionibus," in the old Latin medical literature, which, it is said to have produced an era in medical literature, and to have had a great influence, exerted before the invention of printing, most of necessity have been very limited.

It may be said, that in sketching lightly the history of so many Sages Femmes, we have not proved that women have contributed anything to medical science. It is true that only a number of women have devoted themselves to it in any single century. They have done it in spite of great difficulties, and amid much opposition. They have had to overcome prejudices. We forbear to dwell on their rich contributions to both the medical and the general literature of their time. It should be remembered that the scanty, but brilliant contributions owe what popularity they have to intrinsic merit. They have sought and found the light of day, without the pompous recommendations of traditions, or the influence of the patronage of a clique. Morata's lectures were not confined to obstetrics; and we have the testimony of physicians themselves, that until the Reformation, they were not only ordinary medical authorities, but distinguished men like Sollinger and Guillemeau, depended upon women for their medical knowledge. Mme. Boivin, and Mme. Mauriceau, Bourgeois altered the practice of the whole world in the treatment of a large class of hemorrages. Mad. Breton perfected, more than a hundred years ago, the recovery of artificial nourishment, still in use in France.

Mrs. Blackwell prepared the first illustrated Medical Dictionary. Mesdames Broadray, Biberon and Morrands independently assisted in perfecting the manikin; and Biberon and Morrands independently perfected the manikin, which, Dr. Dalton says, "has resisted successfully quackeries which deluded all the faculty of their time. Mrs. Dusanilly, with the roughest instruments, succeeded in saving the life of Mouvart, when physicians had failed. Mad. Roulet adapted, so that it became of practical benefit, the tube that not all the genius and learning of Bichat could make the physicians comprehend the uses of the stethoscope. Mad. Wittembach was consulted by all the physicians of her time, and medical science felt and acknowledged her influence. Her name was all sufficient to give the highest medical recommendations. Her interest in it was free from folly or personal weakness, and with her last breath she desired that the result of a post-mortem examination might be made for the benefit of scientific friends. A

"We would not be thought, from the facts above presented, to have a narrow or illiberal interest in the education of women. We do not wish to turn them into a swarm of midwives, or a college of physicians; but we wish the sources of all knowledge to be open to women as well as to men, and we have thought that to inquire what they had already done, might decide the question. "What have they a right to do?" The limit to human acquisition must be, not the greatest or most easy, but the highest, purest, and no question of sex can complicate the statement."

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

It is known (says the Literary World) from the poems of Mrs. Barrett Browning that Miss Mitford is a friend of that refined and spiritual authoress. Among certain "Recollections of a Literary Life," just published in London, Miss Mitford gives the world become acquainted with some of the peculiar shadows of that "fair grief" which dwells throughout the poems of Mrs. Browning. Somebody produces of the author of the "Seraphim." This is the story, as quoted in the Athenæum:

"My friend Miss Barrett! Elizabeth Barrett commenced about fifteen years ago. She was certainly one of the most interesting persons that I had ever seen. Perhaps I should then saw her, said the same; so that it is not merely the impression of my partiality or my enthusiasm. Of a slight, delicate figure, with a shower of dark curls falling on either side of a pale, spiritual face, with large tender eyes richly fringed with dark eyelashes, a smile like a sunbeam, and such a look of youthfulness, that I had some difficulty in persuading myself that in science rarriage we went together to Chiswick, that the translatress of the 'Prometheus' of Æschylus, the author of the 'Essay on Mind,' was old enough to be introduced into society, or, indeed, old enough to wear out. Through the kindness of another invalid friend, to whom I owe many obligations, but none so great as this, I had seen her, a little before, once in town. We went so constantly and so familiarly that in spite of the difference of age intimacy ripened into a friendship. Every day return into the country, we corresponded freely and frequently, her letter being just what letters ought to be—her own self, and upon paper. The next year was a painful one to himself and to his friends. She broke a blood-vessel upon the lungs, which did not heal. If there had been consumption in the family that disease would have declared itself. There were no seeds of the fatal English malady in her constitution, and she escaped. Still, however, the vessel did not heal, and she was ordered, for above a twelvemonth at her father's house in Wimpole street, to Chiswick, on the approach of winter, ordered her to a milder climate. Her eldest brother, a brother in heart and in talent, and in the affection of her family and other devoted relatives, accompanied her to Torquay, and there occurred the fatal event which saddened her young life, and left behind it a deeper hue of thought and feeling, especially of devotion, and feeling to her poetry. I have so often been asked what could be the cause which had passed over that young heart, that now that time is gone by, I may, perhaps, be allowed to mention it. The first agony of a bereavement seems to me right that the world should hear the story of an accident in which there was much sorrow, but no blame. The brother, a young man of high promise, and invalid, still attended by his affectionate companions, had derived much benefit from the mild sea breezes of Devonshire. One fine summer morning he favoured the ladies, accompanied by two other fine young men, his friends, embarked on board a small sailing vessel for a trip of a few hours. Excellent sailors, and familiar with the bay, as they said, they took the boatmen, and undertook themselves the management of the little craft. Danger was not thought of, nor, even after the catastrophe no one could divine the cause, but in a few minutes after their embarkation, and in sight of their very windows, just as they were crossing the bar, the boat went down, and all were lost, not a few perished. Even the bodies were never found. I was staying at a party who were travelling that year in Devonshire and Cornwall, and I remember that large tents on the corner houses of every village street, in the church or church door, and almost on every cliff for miles and miles along the coast, handbills, offering large rewards for linen cast upon the shore with the initials of the beloved dead; for it so chanced that all the three were of the dearest and the best; one, I believe, was a clergyman, the son of a widow. This tragedy nearly killed Elizabeth Barrett. She was utterly prostrated by the horror and the grief, and had been in some sort an invalid ever since. It was not until the following year that she could be removed in an invalid carriage, and by journeys of twenty miles a day, to her eldest brother's in London home. The house that she occupied at Torquay had been chosen as one of the most sheltered in the place. It stood at the bottom of the cliffs, almost close to the sea; and she told me herself that during that whole winter the sound of the waves rang in her ears like the moans of one dying. Still she clung to literature and to Greek; in all probability she would have died without that wholesome diversion to her thoughts. Her medical attendants did not always understand this. To prevent the remonstrances of her friendly physician, Dr. Berry, she caused a small edition of Plato to be so bound and kind though he was, he knew not how, skilful were not an arduous and painful study, but a consolation and a delight. Returned to London, she confined to one large and commodious room many years chamber, admitting only her own affectionate family and a few devoted friends. I myself have often fully travelled five-and-forty miles to see her, and returned the same evening without entering another house; yielding almost every book worth reading in almost every language, and giving herself heart and soul to that poetry of which she seemed born to be the priestess. Gradually her health improved. About four years ago, she married Mr. Browning, and immediately accompanied him to Pisa, where they then settled at Florence; and this summer I have had the exquisite pleasure of seeing her once more in London with a lovely boy at her knee, almost as well as ever, and telling him of the distant forests, and scrambling on mulehack up the sonorous Alpes, and the Pyrenees. May Heaven continue to her such health and such happiness."

The Friend of Humanity.

BY LUCY A. COLBY.

NEVER was a more beautiful picture of Christian charity and benevolence presented to the world than in the life of Mrs. Eliza Garnaut, an emigrant from Ireland, who died in 1848. For many years she was connected with the Moral Reform Society in Boston, and afterwards became Matron of the Home for Orphan and Destitute Children. She had a full victim to her unstriving devotion to others. While she was nursing the two infants of a woman who had died of cholera, she contracted the disease, and died the 3d of September, 1849, aged 39 years.

Why throng those lonely weepers round the door
Of yonder dwelling this September morn,
Why hushed the footfall, why the tone of sorrow
Their breasts were pierced by Sorrow's rankling dart?

Why seek they not to banish looks forlorn
By strolling in the fields and silent woods?
Why not, in search of autumn's golden corn—
There blossom flowers in sylvan solitudes
That make us glad again, e'en in our saddest moods.

For fields and woods and blue skies bending o'er
Their heads, they have not now a passing thought
Of the sweet spirit who has gone to restore—
The kind, good friend whose words were ever fraught
With love—whose clear unerring wisdom taught
Their wayward souls, in Nature's lap to stray,
O, Nature's brightest forms to them are naught,
Since we're again Her smile of gladness may Beam bright from Heaven around their cloud way!

Amid the city's haunts of wo and sin
An angel visitant she seemed to be:
Where source a ray of light looked kindly in
Her presence was felt, and her voice heeded
The drear shader of vice and misery,
Her purposes of goodness to fulfil,
Her soul was ever with the suffering free;
Undaunted by a thought of fear or ill,
While thus upcomplaining the Heavenly Father's will.

The friendless stranger, homeless and distressed,
Never looked to her for sympathy in vain;
Mourners, in her, found a friend, and were all solaced
In listening to her words, forgot their pain;
The bleeding slave escaping from the chain,
She shelter'd with her kind and watchful care.
And the poor, ruined maid, with frantic brain,
Across whose path, with flowers once bright and fair,
The wily serpent trailed and left his poison there.

But all her deeds of love are ended now:
Her hands are folded, her lips are silent—mute—
Death's seal is set upon her pallid brow!
Yet not unnoticed sinks she to her rest
Amid the life which she has tended by him
To be the restoration of the Empire under the Bonparte dynasty. By the decree, or senatus-consultum, which constituted Louis Napoleon Emperor in 1804, the imperial succession was thus prescribed:

1st. To the lineal heirs male of Napoleon, in the order of primogeniture.

2d. To Joseph Bonaparte, to such son or grandson of his brother as Napoleon might designate, and the heirs male of such son or grandson.

3d. To Joseph Bonaparte and his heirs male.

4th. Failing these, to Louis Bonaparte, his heirs male, each in the order of primogeniture.

The only son of Napoleon, the Duke of Reichstadt, died in 1832, leaving the Count de Survilliers, the eldest brother of Napoleon, known as Count de Survilliers, and who resided for many years in New Jersey, died in 1844, leaving no male issue, but an son, Louis, ex-King of Holland, the father of the present Louis Napoleon, died in 1846, shortly after the escape of his son from the fortress of Ham. The other son of Louis and Hortense died, one in infancy, the other at the age of 27, leaving Louis Napoleon the only survivor, and the last in the prescribed succession.

To this order of succession, the legitimacy is probable Louis Napoleon alludes in his proclamation to the people of France: "If you believe in the cause of the people, if you believe in the principle, that it was generated by the revolution of '89, and organized by the Emperor, proclaim it," &c.

Jerome, the youngest brother of Napoleon, some time king of Westphalia, has addressed a letter to his nephew "in the name of the memory of my brother, and partaking his horror of civil war," urging a respectful acquiescence in the decree.
